Family Studies and Human Services

The K-State School of Family Studies and Human Services (FSHS) offers its bachelor's degree program (general option) on the K-State at Salina campus. The program focuses on the processes underlying human development in a family context across the life cycle. Students learn to implement and assess programs and services designed to strengthen and enhance individual and family well-being.

Careers for people who like to work with people

Graduates in family studies and human services work in youth programs, family social service programs, residential programs, the courts, cooperative extension, higher education, public health departments, 4-H and youth development programs, mental health centers, nursing homes, and churches.

Curriculum requirements (124 credit hours required for graduation)
